OCIETY IN WASHINGTON

not fully understand the importance of the Red Star Animal Relief have said that their only interest was to help the seldier. They do not realise that by helping the horse they aid the soldier in his most vital work for without horse transportation the food supply suffers, ammunition fails, light artillery does not get where it is wanted and needd, cavalry is helpless and camp equipment and supplies are not moved, because supplies and munitions must be moved by animals from terminal points of mechanical haulage to the first line trenches. Ordinarily motor service is not rendered closer than within five miles of the trenches or firing line. If the English, French and Italian governments had found motor service adequate, would they have bought 1,500,000 horses and mules in the United States at a cost something like 1900,000,000? If the motor service alone suffered for army need, would the belligerents of Europe have gathered 4,500,000 horses for field use?

There is a cunning little poem, by St. La Fielding, of the British army, which tells a fighting soldier's plea for the suffering war horse:

The council will meet once or twice monthly, either in Paris or in Lon-don, to consider proposals for pur-chases by the allied governments of supplies in the United States and in neutral countries. Meanwhile, ex-perts on the council's staff will make a study of these proposals, comparing them particularly with a view to expending the funds supplied by the United States to the maximum advantage.
